- [1] The color patterns of many flowers hold exciting surprises. While it is impossible for humans to see them, certain species have marks and colors only visible under UV light. To whom or what could flowers be showing these secret messages? Scientists say that the answer is bees.
- [2] Bees see different colors than humans. In particular they see UV light, which is beyond the color purple and impossible for humans to see. Many flowers have adapted so that bees will see their special markings and visit the flower. In fact, some of these markings are so specialized, certain types of bees are more attracted to them than to others. If the bees always go to the same type of flowers, the flowers can easily share their pollen and nectar. That is why scientists call these markings “nectar guides”.
- [3] Nectar guides evolved for the mutual benefit of flowers and bees. Our ecosystems rely on relationships such as the ones between bees and specially marked flowers to maintain balance and live in harmony.

62. What is the main idea of the passage?
- (A) Animals depend on the activity of bees.
(B) UV light can change the color of plants.
